Blogs Web Shows Resources Hurricane Sandy a blow to Tokyo stocks Asian stocks and the euro suffered losses following Hurricane Sandy in the U.S. Wednesday. The benchmark Nikkei 225 fell 5.8 percent and the European single currency sank nearly 2.5 percent in trading following the massive storm that swamped parts of the East Coast. The storm was a "significant event" for the Japanese market, Mizuho Securities' chief market analyst, Kiyoshi Fukuoka said. "It's the first time a hurricane has hit Japan directly." Bolstering sentiment in the wake of the storm was the government's decision to postpone Thursday's U.S.-Japan trade and investment meeting, which had been scheduled for Thursday in Washington. Asia posted some of the losses. The Singaporean market fell as much as 2 percent and the Hong Kong Hang Seng dropped as much as 4 percent in its worst session since June 24, with the Wall Street Hang Seng added 0.3 percent. Foreign investors accounted for about 30 percent of the losses on the Tokyo Stock Exchange in the latest session, according to preliminary data. Japan's benchmark is mostly made up of domestic investors. An emergency session of the U.S. Federal Reserve Wednesday brought the near-term fate of the central bank's stimulus program into focus. The central bank cut its U.S. short-term interest-rate target to a range of zero to 0.25 percent and indicated it could ease a third round of stimulus if the economy starts to worsen in coming months. The results of the cut, along with the Fed's continued message of "patient" policy, had a predictable effect on bond and equity markets worldwide, although the Fed's action was widely expected and is not expected to affect the dollar. The New York Stock Exchange index fell 0.4 percent, but the Dow edged up a fraction, rising 0.5 percent to 13,972. The S&P 500 was down 0.6 percent. The Nasdaq lost 0.5 percent.
